THE INVESTIGATION REOPENED

As the election is less than one week away, I continue to be asked why at this crucial time did Comey reopen the Hillary Clinton email investigation.

If I may speculate, I strongly suspect that back in July Comey originally wanted to take the Hillary Clinton case to a grand jury. As a seasoned professional prosecutor, he would never have interviewed her without a court reporter had he not been pressured by the Justice Department not to indict. In my prior writings, I stated that the fix was in, as his actions were inconsistent with a creditable investigation. To give him the benefit of the doubt, I believe he received overwhelming pressure, and he caved.

Comey's admonishment of Hillary Clinton, prior to announcing back in early July his decision not to indict, went against Comey's and the FBI's empowered purpose. I suspect he was revolted by having to testify before Congress and compromise his personal ethics. I would further speculate the he conceded with the caveat that nothing new would surface to undermine the position he was forced to take regarding indictment. His public position was a total insult to his office, and sent a terrible message to his agents.

Now that all this new information has been exposed, Comey has taken the position that all bets are off, and he will have the opportunity to step up. Also, it is obvious that Congress is going to pursue the Hillary Clinton investigation after the election, and Comey may be severely embarrassed for his earlier decision. At the very least, the facts overwhelmingly supported taking this case to a grand jury.

Comey's announcement is huge. Notwithstanding the reports that Hillary garnered a majority of the early voting prior to the announcement, Trump just might make this a close election. As full disclosure, I have cast my votes, and did not vote for Clinton or Trump. This election is a sad example of how the political process has failed the American people.

It is still my belief that barring an even larger smoking gun in this last week leading up to the election, Hillary Clinton will be elected the first woman president of the United States. I believe she is the most corrupt candidate to ever run for president. I also believe a number of the republican primary candidates would have prevailed over Clinton. It is unfortunate that Donald Trump was the one choice to make her electable. I further believe that both Congress and the FBI will aggressively investigate President Hillary Clinton, and I predict an indictment is in her future. Can anyone say President Kaine?

I find it ironic that Clinton's strategy to use BleachBit was actually effective. To date, emails obtained by WikiLeaks have not rendered any emails originating from Clinton herself. Nevertheless, the Anthony Wiener investigation could cause her downfall.

The exposé of the Clinton Foundation and other Clinton controlled entities will prove to be a story that will surpass Watergate; books, movies, and, who knows, perhaps even a Broadway play. If "Evita" was a hit, certainly "Hillary" could be a major success. Bill and Hillary have certainly pushed the envelope, and those who hitched to their wagon have found themselves thrown under the bus.

The ultimate penalty for the Clintons: sentence them to share a cell with one another while doing their time. Now, that would be justice, and deserving payback for preaching "Stronger Together."
